Setting the Curve

The Law School and its faculty were recently rated as best in the country, and things are only going to get better from here.

Chicago International

A new journal and workshop are helping stamp "CHICAGO" on the study and practice of international law.

The Practice

Multidisciplinary practice has been called the most important issue facing the legal profession in the past 100 years. What does it mean for the Law School?

Our Timeless Mission

The founders of the Law School envisioned an institution that reached back to the wisdom of the past even as it looked forward to the challenges of the future. The law and its practice are "the crystallization of ages of human progress," wrote University of Chicago President William Rainey Harper in laying out his aims for the new law school. "They cannot be understood in their entirety without a clear comprehension of the historic forces of which they are the product, and of the social environment with which they are in living contact."

This issue of The Record describes some of the ways in which your Law School is sustaining its leadership of legal education, some of the recognition it has received for doing so, and some of the steps it is taking to insure that it remains always in the forefront.
